It was 12 hours after the catastropke when the last of the cruelly mangled bodies at the county morgue were identified.

According to the stories of the badly frightened survivors, the accident happened so quickly that none of them knew just what had taken place. The Grand Trunk crew in charge of the locomotive, 1715, refused to give their names, as did the members of the switching crew. The crew asserts that the switch engine had the right of way. There is a deralling device at this crossing and the train crew claim there was nothing to prevent the conductor of the street car from seeing the oncoming cars had he operated the derailing device.
